

Understanding Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder

ADHD

UNIVERSITY OF STIRLING

DEPARTMENT OF
NURSING AND MIDWIFERY

'We're first in Scotland for Nursing and Midwifery
Education and Research'

The University of Stirling is very pleased to announce the first accredited ADHD module of it's kind in Scotland.

We know that ADHD affects approximately 5% of school aged children and 4% of the adult population yet the vast majority never get a diagnosis or any treatment or support. This is largely down to a lack of understanding of the disorder as well as a real dearth of formal training in ADHD.

There is a huge range of agencies and services who work on a daily basis with those affected by ADHD, including nurses, doctors, psychologists, teachers, social workers, voluntary sector, police and general practitioners amongst many others.

This module has been developed to help improve the knowledge and skills of those working alongside the ADHD population in order to help deliver appropriate support and care to those affected. The module is delivered on line over a 3 month period and students will be examined through the development of a 5,000 word portfolio pertaining to their area of practice .

For further information or to apply:
Visit our website: <http://www.nm.stir.ac.uk>
and follow the link for Continuing Professional Development.

For further details or an application pack, please contact the Continuing Professional Development Co-ordinator:

Telephone: 01786 466336

E-mail: nmcpd@stir.ac.uk

