Does the law matter?

Young people, sex and relationships

Dynamic Earth, Edinburgh, 17 June 2008

Changing Scottish law around sexual activity between teenagers would have significant implications for young people's health and wellbeing. What would the consequences be for peer pressure, confidentiality and how agencies deal with disclosure of sexual activity? Would young people be better protected, or would changing in the law undermine young people's access to services and work to promote healthy relationships?

If you work with young people, or in work related to sexual health or policy-making within the statutory, health or voluntary sectors, this event will be a key opportunity to learn more about the proposals, to consider the implications of any legal change in detail and discuss the future direction of work around young people's sexual wellbeing in Scotland.
