Campaigning for equal citizenship for people with learning difficulties

www.communityliving.co.uk

In the summer issue...

- Can Anne deliver the goods? Seán Kelly interviews National Director Anne Williams
- Supporting people through bereavement
- What made Saeed-Alim – alias Nicky Reilly, a man with Asperger's and learning difficulties – walk into a busy Exeter restaurant with the intention of causing major loss of life? Richard Curen analyses what may have motivated him to attempt such a crime.
- Can Individual Budgets work in health services? We continue our series on the initiatives being introduced by the In Control team
- Choosing to have a Down's baby – a mother explains her decision. "...suddenly I was feeling okay, alright, it's Down's Syndrome. So what? I just felt that this was my baby and there was no way I was going to part with him".
- Coping with the pain of loss. Michelle Brooks looks at ways of supporting bereaved people

- Using the internet to access services

Coming next...

- Using the internet to access services
- Barriers to relationships and sexuality for young people with learning difficulties – new research finds sex education is inadequate
- June's story – at 63 June finally got her own home
- The work strategy – is it strategically unworkable?
- In Control – how it can work with children and young people
- New student section – getting off to a good start

Our editorial policy:

- To promote equality of citizenship
- To promote the inclusion of people with learning difficulties in every aspect of society
- To provide readers with essential information in accessible language
- To encourage people to express themselves in the magazine
- To encourage people to work together to produce their own solutions
- To challenge laws, regulations and traditional ideas which hamper people from achieving their aspirations
- To publicise examples of radical ideas being put into practice.
