Valuing people now, from progress to transformation, set an agenda for people with learning disabilities across a range of issues, including employment. It builds on the vision set out in valuing people (2001) which was the first white paper in people with learning disabilities in 30 years a vision based on the four main principles of rights, independence, choice and inclusion and sets out "Big priorities" to be delivered over the years 2008 - 2011.

What people do during the day, insuring inclusion with a particular focus on paid work being one of them. Valuing people aims are that people have good lives doing the things they want to do. It says people should have the chance to get a job.

It is a commonly held belief that to achieve we first need to believe it is possible. For many people with a learning disability an additional barrier to getting into work is the acute lack of positive affirmation. Together we must challenge this wholly unacceptable debilitating practice starting with those professionals who are charged with serving people with learning disabilities.

Since Valuing People came out a few more people have been getting paid work but there are many people still in day centres who cannot get a paid job.

The next steps are to make sure that we make this a priority in supporting into paid employment.

The government are looking at the way that job centres support people with learning disabilities to get a job.

The North West regional forum of people with a learning disability identified that one of their three big issues was employment "give us a job and pay us the same". Insufficient progress has been made, and one of the biggest barriers to employment is often around the inflexibility of earnings.

This conference aims to discuss and look at some of the issues and hopefully support the government to identify some of the issues. What has the government done to help support people into employment and what have the public sector done to remove barriers that have been identified to make real change happen.

The social exclusions taskforce from the cabinet office will be presenting some of their work along side a representative from the DWP.
