Behaviour support events 2008

The emotional impact of self injurious behaviour

CONFERENCE:

8 February 2008 • Midlands

The emotional impact of self injurious behaviour

Self injurious behaviour causes stress for people supporting individuals who exhibit it, because it is emotive and the behaviour can be resistant to change. We will explore the impact of self injurious behaviour on families, carers and employed staff and offer practical advice, solutions and an opportunity to discuss key issues for delegates.

This event is an opportunity to network, discuss and gain knowledge that will enhance practice within services and lead to the development of appropriate frameworks for supporting people who may be described as having or using challenging behaviour.

Who should attend

The day is aimed at practitioners, teachers, support workers, case managers and service managers who have a professional interest in supporting children, young people and adults across a variety of settings who are described as challenging and may exhibit self injurious behaviour.

Aims

By the end of the day delegates will have had the opportunity to:

- Develop knowledge and understanding of self injurious behaviour
- Explore different perspectives concerning the causes, prevention and management of self injurious behaviour
- Increase an understanding of current research related to this area
- Develop an understanding of the experiences of supporting a family member
- Share issues and best practice with colleagues
